ARTICLE WRITING COMPETITION

Theme: “Breaking the Glass Ceiling: Women’s Political Participation”

Date: March 04, 2025

The competition witnessed enthusiastic participation from the students who expressed their thoughts, research, and perspectives on issues surrounding the underrepresentation of women in politics, barriers they face, and the importance of their active involvement in decision-making processes. Over eight entries were received from the students, whose submissions were judged on originality, relevance to the theme, coherence, and depth of analysis.

Breaking the Glass Ceiling: Women's path to political leadership

For centuries, political power has been concentrated in the hands of men, not by merit but by design. A man's ambition is seen as natural; a woman's as defiance. Women have been told to wait, to prove themselves repeatedly, to accept that leadership is a privilege granted, not a right earned. But the tide has turned. Women are no longer waiting; they are dismantling the very structures built to exclude them.

The glass ceiling in politics is not just a metaphor, it is a system of resistance. Resistance against women holding authority, against their ability to command without being questioned, against their right to exist in power without justification. And yet, they are breaking through.

In Himachal Pradesh, 50% of panchayat seats are now held by women. However, many still struggle against deep-seated patriarchy, where male relatives attempt to govern in their name. But a shift is underway. Women like Chhavi Rajawat have refused to be symbolic figures. She walked away from a corporate career to govern her village on her terms, proving that leadership is not granted, it is taken.

Women are not just stepping into politics; they are redefining it. Jacinda Ardern led New Zealand through a crisis with competence, not theatrics. Sanna Marin changed perceptions of leadership in Finland. Nirmala Sitharaman commands India's economy, a space once dominated by men.

Yet, every time a woman rises to power, the world hesitates. “Can she handle it?” The question echoes, not out of genuine curiosity, but out of centuries-old conditioning that equates leadership with masculinity. Why must women prove competence while men are assumed to have it? The glass ceiling is not just cracking, it is collapsing. Women are not merely entering politics, they are transforming it.

BA 2nd year.

Breaking the glass ceiling : Women's path to political leadership

Written by Anushka Sharma BA 1ST YEAR

In a world where women makeup roughly half of the world's population , they hold a mere fraction of political leadership positions. From Begum Hazrat Mahal to Randi Laxmi Bai of Jhansi , women have played important diplomatic and administrative roles in the past yet they are not encouraged to take active participation in politics.

Women in executive government positions

As of these data, there are 33.3% women in executive government positions. This is a significant step towards gender equality in the highest positions of power, but it is still far from the 50% goal set by the Sustainable Development Goals.

Not all countries have a woman Head of State, and in countries where a woman Head of State, she is often seen as a symbol of progress and change.

There are no clear barriers that are women are facing in politics. However, there are several challenges that women face in politics, such as gender inequality, lack of resources, and discrimination. These challenges are often rooted in patriarchal structures and social norms that value male leadership over female leadership.

Data compiled data by UN Women show that women represent 33.3 per cent of cabinet members holding ministries, leading a policy area as of 1 January 2024 (4).

are less legitimate and capable leaders than men.

Women in politics and structural Challenges

Women in political spheres face sexual harassment, other microaggressions, judgement and stringent scrutiny from their marital status , to their personal decisions of having children or not , every aspect is commented upon. Women also often have less access to the resources necessary for successfully seeking a party nomination or running in an election than men. This includes limited access to financial networks and political patronage. Despite there being 33% of reservation for women on the local government level in India , very few women take the lead.

Breaking the glass ceiling

The 'glass ceiling' is an invisible barrier preventing women from rising beyond a certain level of hierarchy in politics.

P for politics , P for patriarchy

Politics being male dominated leads to patriarchal social structures and policies which therefore lead to the exclusion of women. Attitude towards politics in general being 'dirty/corrupt/dangerous' doesn't help either.

Redundant Mindsets

People believe that women inherently do not possess the decision making , problem solving and other skills required to be strong leaders. Stereotypes in the media perpetuate the idea that women
