Dr Devkanya Thakur has explained in her documentary No Woman's Land, that despite the talk about women empowerment, security and the need to address the imbalance in child sex ratio, a significant amount of money is still spent on women's programs. However, in some parts of India, such as the tribal areas of Himachal Pradesh, the law is still gender biased. According to the revenue law prevalent in these areas, a woman is prohibited from inheriting ancestral property from both her paternal and maternal sides, which is a manifestation of patriarchal attitudes.

Dr Devkanya Thakur's short film "No Woman's Land" was produced in 2015 to shed light on the issue of gender-biased laws prevailing in tribal areas of Himachal Pradesh, which prevent women from inheriting ancestral property from both paternal and maternal sides. Despite facing resistance from the male society of tribal districts, Dr Thakur continued to screen the film at different platforms to bring the issue into the public domain. Her efforts resulted in the issue gaining attention from local and national media, which eventually brought it to the notice of the Himachal Pradesh High Court.

The second film showcased the challenges faced by women in the sport of skiing, a male-dominated field, and their remarkable achievements. Both documentaries directed by Dr Devkanya Thakur were captivating and inspiring. The International Women's Day celebration organized by the Directorate of Women and Child Development, H.P. provided an excellent opportunity for the students to witness such impactful films and take part in an event that aimed to empower women.
